President Jacob Zuma, as part of this year's Freedom Day celebrations, will bestow national orders, the country's highest civilian honour, on 28 South Africans and three foreigners for outstanding achievements and contributions to the country's freedom and development.

Included in the awards are posthumous honours for Albert Luthuli and Oliver Tambo, whose family names have been institutionalised in South Africa's national orders because of the unique contributions they made during the country's struggle for liberation.

Addressing the media at in Pretoria on Monday, Chancellor of the National Orders Cassius Lubisi said this year's recipients were all "men and women who have attuned their skills and knowledge so as to ameliorate human suffering and benefit humankind, often at the expense of deserved emoluments for their efforts.

"We are eternally grateful for their lives and sacrifices they made to ensure that the people of South Africa are free."
